Why You Should Not Delay Hep C Treatment

I was fit and healthy for 40 years with hep C, and then one day I went downhill so fast and so suddenly that it looked like I would die.

Often people delay treating their Hep C. They delay Hep C treatment for lots of different reasons.

Sometimes they want to try to cure their Hep C with herbal treatments or vitamins or diet. I tried that, I know lots of people who tried that…no-one succeeded.

Some worry about side effects from the Hep C treatment, but the side effects of having Hepatitis C are much worse than any side effects from Hep C treatment.

Sometimes it is a shortage of money, but if you die because you did not spend a few hundred dollars there is no sense in that!

Sometimes they just think that there is no urgency…they have had Hep C for ten years or 20 years so another year or two will not matter.

Wrong!

The fact is that one percent of all people infected by Hepatitis C will die from its effects each year. Some of those will have had Hep C 20 or 30 years and some will have had it five or ten years. The thing is you never know and you don't get much warning either.

I was fit and healthy as an ox for 40 years with Hep C and then one day I went down so fast and so suddenly that it looked like I would die. Obviously I didn't but let me tell you my doctors thought I had liver cancer and were pretty sure I

The longer you wait to begin treatment, the longer the virus has to cause life-threatening damage to your liver. Without treatment, a person with hepatitis C-related liver damage, such as liver scarring, is very likely to die from liver cancer, liver failure, or other related causes.
