

Letting Others Help: The Value of Hep C Warriors Support

Sometimes it's hard to let others in our lives help out as we battle with hep C treatment.

November 17, 2020 By Connie M. Welch

We want to be strong for others. Hold up all of our responsibilities. We may suffer in silence and not even acknowledge to others that we have Hep C.

We may feel they should understand how we feel, but how could they? No one can read our minds and know what we need.

Personally, I am a very independent person. I am generally the caregiver, not the one who is needing care. I don't receive well. When I was on treatment for Hep C I had to learn to let go. Open up. Allow others in. My impatience with my condition went up and down like a meter. I realized I was creating more stress for myself. In turn, I was hurting others and cheating myself by being stubborn.

I learned I didn't always have to wear a smile if I were having a bad day. When my energy level was as low as the sole of my shoe, it was good when I communicated that. If I needed something before Mr. Fix-It came home I could call him and ask him to pick something up. Or just tell him I needed a hug and shed a few tears.

I allowed family to go with me to doctors' appointments. Friends would come over and bring a meal. Friends and neighbors would ask me to call them if I needed something which often I didn't call, but there were times when they would call me to check on me and I asked if they would pick an item up from the store.

My sister in love and brother called to check on me when I was feeling sick, before I knew it they got in their car and traveled from Houston to spend time with me and took me to the doctor. It made me feel like the cavalry had come. Re-enforcements were there to help me fight the battle. It made a huge difference in my treatment and getting through it.

Another time my best friend came and spent the entire weekend with me. She cooked, cleaned, and uplifted my spirits through her wonderful visit. Connecting with others by blogging on my website brought me great support. It helped me to feel closer to others when I reached out with gut honesty on how things were going.

Here is what I learned from letting others help:

1. Others don't know what I need unless I communicate it.
2. By allowing others to help me does not mean I am weak.
3. Strength, comfort, and refreshment were given to me when I opened up and allowed others to help. It worked like a tonic to my weary body, mind, and spirit and made me feel better.
4. God used each person to make a positive difference in my life.
5. It helped me feel not alone in my battle.

How about you, do you let others help you? Do you reach out and communicate how you feel or what you need?

Share your comment below. We'd love to hear from you.

This entry was originally published in Life Beyond Hep C, and is reprinted with permission.

© 2026 Smart + Strong All Rights Reserved.

<http://beta.docker.hepmag.com/blog/letting-others-help-value-hep-c-warriors-support>